

How the Scientific Account of Creation Supports Belief in God

Atheists claim that the scientific account of creation does not require God (no divine intervention necessary). All of creation derives from the laws of physics. However, the laws of physics were fine-tuned to support creation. The fine tuning requires a designer, and the designer is God. The intent of this talk is not to promote the scientific account of creation, but to point out that if it is true, it implies the existence of God. We will walk through the specific aspects of the scientific account of creation: (1) The development of stars and planets following the Big Bang and (2) the development of living cells from non-living matter. - All in layman's terms, without incomprehensible scientific mumbo-jumbo. The evidence of design will be identified. A limited amount of grade school mathematics will be taught, to clarify the concepts.

